Eat This Now!

Peak season: March through June

ASPARAGUS Sure, you can eat asparagus in December, but it probably will have traveled 5,000 miles before landing on your plate. Reality is, the spears will never be as tender or flavorful as they are right now, when they're grown closer to home. Asparagus is loaded with bone-protecting vitamin K, and it's rich in folate, which may help ward off heart disease. "It's a nutritious alternative to starches as a side with fish or poultry," says Milton Stokes, M.P.H., R.D., a spokesman for the American Dietetic Association. Toss a bunch with olive oil, cracked pepper, and Parmesan cheese. Roast for 10 minutes in a 400°F oven or on a medium-high grill. Finish with a squeeze of lemon. When they're this fresh, they don't need much.

Q: STRIP STEAK COSTS $12 A POUND. GOT ANY IDEAS FOR A CHEAPER SOURCE OF PROTEIN?

Bite for bite, you can't beat lentils. For about a buck a pound, these tiny legumes pack tons of protein and fiber and couldn't be easier to cook. Combine a chopped carrot, a chopped onion, and a few minced garlic cloves with 3 cups of chicken stock and 1 cup of dry lentils. Simmer for 20 minutes. For a killer one-pot meal, slip a chicken breast directly into the lentils as they start to simmer.

WHAT PRODUCE NEEDS TO BE REFRIGERATED?

Mom may have put the entire produce aisle in the refrigerator, but the cold, enclosed environment can diminish the taste of fresh produce, especially fruit. Unless you have the luxury of buying and using produce every day, do what your market does: Keep all your green vegetables and fresh herbs in the fridge, and leave fruit—including tomatoes and avocados—and root vegetables like onions and potatoes out.
